How To Live Again

Transformation of public housing in Hong Kong

Living within the monolithic structure, we become inert to the offers from nature, and live in the placeness corners of the tower.

Hardly we leave our traces and stories within the silent construction.

The seemingly lifeless architecture grows without gaining our presence.

Only by embracing the nature, can we unfold the desire of the construction. The long-grown identity of the structure shall implode within its shell.

Space flows within the defined, and the subtle narrowness searches to open up the dialogue with the vast openness.

The opening should no longer be merely a window.

Beyond the habitat of the family, there will be something more within the construction that we find resonance.

We shall converse with the structure and let nature flow in. Together, we then re-create with the construction a new sense of home.
